Q What were Pope John XXIII's hopes and goals for the ecumenical council that he convoked?

A Fifty years ago, on January 25, 1959, at the end of the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, newly-elected Pope John XXIII made a brief announcement to a small group of cardinals gathered at the Roman basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls. In his brief talk, John announced his intention to convoke an ecumenical council and gave an indication of his hopes for the council.

John talked about the need to reaffirm the church's doctrine, traditions and practices, while addressing several things that were close to his heart. He hoped that the council would promote "the enlightenment, edification and joy of the entire Christian people." John also wished that the council would extend "a renewed cordial invitation to the faithful of the separated communities to participate with us in this quest for unity and grace, for which so many souls long."

Both of these hopes were remarkable when compared to the attitudes of previous popes. John spoke in a positive, affirming and joyful manner of Christians and the world. John's invitation to the other Christian churches was not an invitation to return but an open ended invitation to "participate" in the mutual quest for "unity." This also countered the tendency of previous popes either to avoid or condemn ecumenical encounters. By the summer of 1959 John's hopes would set the tone for the ecumenical council he felt inspired to convoke.
